Music and flowers are the companions of innocence and virtue. In no part of the world is this fact more strikingly exemplified than in Germany. The traveller sees there a more simple and less feverish state of existence than almost anywhere else. He sees there a greater portion of popular content diffused by a more equal distribution of property. He sees a less convulsive straining after the accumulation of enormous fortune. He sees a less incessant devotion to the mere business of money-making and consequently a less intense selfishness of spirit, a more genial and serene enjoyment of life, a more intellectual embellishment of it with music and Bazin's Pomade and Extracts for the Hand- domestic entertainment.
